The Book-plates of
William Fowler Hopson

By Charles Dexter Allen

WILLIAM Fowler Hopson of New Haven, Connecticut, who is not by the count of years, and still less by his own feelings and in the estimation of his friends, an old man, may yet fairly be called an old-time engraver, as he was among the first to take up the book-plate art in the early years of its recent renaissance, being ready then with some years of experience as a proficient engraver on wood, to appreciate what his art could do for the advancement of the book-plate. Some engravers and many designers of book-plates, whose hurried and numerous efforts, as well as booklets about them and their works, find their way quickly and with great frequency to the auction room, remind one of the novelists whose "best sellers" speedily run their course of popularity with a certain public, and then are found in rows on the stands of the second-hand book men as "remainders" to be picked up at fifteen cents apiece by those who discern any inherent value. Mr. Hopson has not worked with feverish rapidity, nor with an eye on the public recognition of his work, but with care and devotion has given his attention to producing designs which carry the message of personality, and to execution best adapted to the work in hand. Engraving on wood, line engraving on copper, etching and aquatint have been used readily and with good judgment, in securing the desired effect. In the seventeen years Mr. Hopson has been engraving book-plates, one of which was spent abroad in complete rest from this line of endeavor, he has made one hundred book-plates. It is safe to say that the owners and users of these book-plates by Mr. Hopson, are as satisfied a body of bookish people, as permanently pleased with the engraver's interpretation of their personal wishes and ideas, and as continuously delighted with their plates as constantly seen in their books, as any one hundred book-plate users anywhere: and this is the best test of work well done.

His work stands another test, secondary but not unimportant, that of the discerning collector who gathers many book-plates and finds it necessary both for convenience and in changing standards of what is desirable, to weed out the negligible and preserve only the truly good. In these moments the plates of Mr. Hopson remain. Many plates which seemed interesting when acquired, come in a few months to raise the query in the collectors' mind, "What did I see in that plate that made me want to keep it?" The book-plates by Mr. Hopson give more instead of less pleasure as the years pass. In looking over the collection of his plates, one realizes soon that a sense of monotony rather frequently felt in the work of many other engravers, does not lay its depressing hand upon his enthusiasm in going completely through the list of Mr. Hopson's work. On the surface this might seem to be due to the pictorial character of the larger number of his plates. Who does not like to look at pictures? Reflection shows that while the pictorial fact, giving its wealth of possibilities of change is an important factor in the sustained interest of his work, other features contribute largely to it, as the absence of the frivolous, the sense of enduring quality each one possesses, the evidence of thought and earnest work, whether in depicting his own designs, or in reproducing those of others, brought to him by clients. Mr. Hopson has worked as faithfully to give full value to the designs of others, as he has to give permanence to his own. Again, there is an inward sense of honor which the observer appreciates as the successful projection of the personality of the engraver into his work, so that each plate lives, tells its story, and loses nothing in repeated examination. Mr. Hopson is happy too, in creating an artistic feeling, in giving form and color to his work. Color, not perhaps considered by many as possible in the engraved book-plate, is in truth a very present and distinguishing mark of his work. Harmony of form and color to scheme and design is noticeable.

The books in Mr. Hopson's plates are very real, due undoubtedly to his fondness for books, his understanding of them. His interiors are not photographically precise and hard, though often profuse in detail and omitting nothing that adds to the sense of "livableness," to the feeling that the owner delights in these actual surroundings, that his hand has held these very volumes, his eye looked forth from this window upon this stretch of lake or meadow. The genuine spirit of the historical is present in his plates that depict scenes, events or objects of historical importance, and in portraiture Mr. Hopson excels many of his contemporaries, preserving in his portrait plates not only forms and features well remembered but expression and lifelikeness.

Give him full rein to design a book-plate, and it is likely Mr. Hopson will do one of two things: either he will give you a bit of nature, like enough in the Bewick completeness and charm, or he will show the subtle drollery that makes him companionable and makes some of his plates a particular joy. A fondness for the out of doors, a sense of the humorous, a love of books and the fire-side, an absorption in his work, tempered with sufficient periods of play and rest, a loyalty to friends and an unfailing sense of the artistic, can be read in all his plates by those who look with understanding eye and mind.

With a century of book-plates completed, together with other innumerable engravings on wood and copper for books in limited editions or privately published, designs given to friends to commemorate personal events, and the intimate unlisted work that attaches to the live engraver's studio, we look forward with expectation of further delightful work from the graver and the etching needle of Mr. Hopson.

Charles Dexter Allen.
